

Science Intern Releases a Red-Tailed Hawk

Emiel, one of our fall interns in the Claire M. Hubbard Science Internship, has a deep fascination with crows and ravens. Recently, he had the unforgettable experience of visiting Nebraska Wildlife Rehab's raptor research blind, where he observed researchers working with birds of prey. The highlight? Emiel was entrusted to release a Red-Tailed Hawk back into the wild—a thrilling moment that further fueled his passion for wildlife and the environment.

No More Empty Pots' science internship empowers students like Emiel to explore STEM fields through hands-on experiences in food systems, the environment, and agriculture. We also encourage unique interests, like Emiel's passion for wildlife rehabilitation. With your support, we're creating pathways for young people to turn their passions into lifelong careers. Thank you for helping us build brighter futures together!
